

Dear reader

The University of Sydney Open Day on the 27th of August was a great opportunity for a hopeful future and for students to and see the facilities and the courses available. Due to increased popularity of certain courses taught by Sydney University lectures a good turnout was present.

The courses of interest to me were the sport science/ dietetics and nutritionist degree, the open day was a great opportunity to me as I was able to attend and see Professor Martin Reynolds speak about the five year master degree. I was able to find out more helpful information they could help decide critical decision making in the future. I was also able to attend further separate lectures in sports science and nutrition degrees, the great lectures by some of the university lecturers as they passed on knowledge and answer any questions that the crowd had thoughts about.

However after the lectures I had attended the lectures I went roaming around check out some the stall such as the chemistry and the biology set outs also gaining handy information learning new things as students were able to showcase the things you get a chance to learn while studying at university and also answering any questions from the public.

The university of Sydney Open day was a good information packed day and also learning new things that I could possibly use in the near the future. Also good indication of diverse university courses available and other pathways through to university.

Best Regards,
